

"TV's Next Generation"

Is it actually possible to construct an explosive device using only a paper clip and some duct tape? And what's the deal with his first name being "Angus"? Are these rhetorical questions being asked in voiceover? (channel 6)

Do not attempt to adjust your television set! The 1995 reboot of the 1963 science fiction anthology series was indeed in color, not black and white! And it did adapt several famous short stories, including "The Sandkings" by some dude named "George R.R. Martin"! (channel 10)

The really ironic thing, other than this cigar-chomping pilot character changing genders between being played by Dirk Benedict in 1978 and Katee Sackhoff in 2003, is that neither version drinks much coffee. (channel 3)

From this lawyer's broadcast debut in 1957 to a short-lived HBO series in 2020, he stopped hanging out in the courtroom quite so much—though he remained a criminal defense attorney—and also got a cool hat. (channel 7)

Queen Latifah headlines this 2021 reboot, preceded by two movies starring Denzel Washington as the title character, both incarnations arguably improvements over the 1985 original with Edward Woodward. (channel 8)
